Boris Johnson says Britain can have an even greater Europe role post-Brexit

Game over on the beach at Palmanova

Calvia.—The Calvia council has decided to limit the area for sports including volleyball on the beach in Palmanova in a move which has angered local sportspeople.

In previous years the top end of the beach had become hugely popular for volleyball and beach football...until yesterday when the council announced that volleyball could now only be played in a 30 metre square area, which according to local sportspeople is not enough. They were informed of the new ruling by a local police patrol earlier this week. The Calvia council said that they welcomed volleyball being played on local beaches but added that the practice should not infringe on tourists and other people on the beach.

The sportspeople intend to fight the move and they claim that they were just trying to enjoy themselves and keep fit and not bother anyone. But for the time being it is game over on the beach.

BRITISH Foreign Secretary Boris Johnson said yesterday that Britain could play an even greater role in Europe despite voting to leave the European Union, a view he said was shared by the United States.

“There’s a massive difference between leaving the EU and our relations with Europe, which if anything I think are going to be intensified,” Johnson, who was appointed to his post on Wednesday, told reporters.

“I was very pleased to receive a phone call from Secretary (John) Kerry of the United States who totally agreed with that analysis. His view was that post-Brexit and after the negotiations, what he really wants to see ... is more Britain abroad, a greater global profile.”
