British expats in Spain form association to fight for their rights

● Association aims to operate across the country and act as a mouthpiece for British citizens who fear for their future.

BRITISH expats are joining forces to fight for their rights following the European Union referendum in June. “Brexpats” is the name of a group which has been formed in Malaga to act as a mouthpiece for British citizens in Spain who fear that they will be heavily hit by the pullout from the European Union. The spokesperson for the group, Anna Hernandez, said yesterday that there were deep fears within the British community in Spain and she added that she hoped that the association would operate Spain wide. British expats fear the end of free medical care and the introduction of work permits. More than 200 people attended their first meeting at the end of last month and more are being planned. Earlier this month the British Consulate and the Calvia council held a meeting at the Calvia town hall attempting to ease some of the fears of expats.

● A fire swept through a bar in the northern French city of Rouen overnight, killing 13 people and injuring six, after a birthday cake with candles and sparklers fell to the floor and set the carpet ablaze, police said. The fire broke out in the basement of the popular Cuba Libre bar and quickly engulfed the room where some 20 people were celebrating, filling it with thick black smoke and poisonous fumes, a Rouen police officer told Reuters.
