Spanish PM could call spring ballot as election talk swirls

Thousands of people marched through Madrid on Sunday calling for Spanish unity in a protest organised by the opposition right wing parties.

- Spanish Prime Minister Pedro Sanchez is considering calling a snap election for mid-April, as the government scrambles to find the support it needs to get a pivotal vote on the 2019 budget through parliament.
- Polls have shown that the conservatives, centre-right and far-right, all of whom have taken a harder line on Catalonia than Sanchez, could win enough votes in a national election to govern together.
- Twelve Catalan politicians go on trial today for their role in Catalonia's failed 2017 independence bid, putting the spotlight back on Spain's biggest political crisis in decades which could make it flare once again across the country.
