Germany to declare Majorca a high risk zone

● Germany is declaring nearly all of Spain, including Majorca, a coronavirus risk region following a spike in cases there, government sources told Reuters yesterday.

The move deals a blow to hopes for a swift revival of mass tourism after months of lockdown to stop the spread of the virus all but wiped out this year's high season for tourism in Europe. Daily Bild reported earlier that Majorca had been added to the list of high-risk regions published by the Robert Koch

Institute (RKI), Germany's public health agency.

The sources told Reuters that all of Spain except for the Canary Islands would be included on RKI's next list of risk regions. The German government considers regions within the European Union high-risk once the number of new coronavirus infections exceeds 50 cases per 100,000 people over the course of seven days. Infections in Spain have spiked in recent days following the end of Spain's tough lockdown seven weeks ago.
