Three dead as woman beheaded in France, gunman killed in second incident: Inside

“We are 28 countries, but as a united body, we’re working too slowly. I’ve seen glaciers move more quickly. We need Europe to come together with a unified plan to get travel moving again otherwise, instead of slipping into a recession, we’ll fall into a depression,” Steve Heapy, Chief Executive Jet2 Holidays.

Viewpoint

It is the sort of no-nonsense statement you would expect from the man who presides over Britain’s biggest holiday company. Steve Heapy is right on all counts and his speech yesterday at a conference in Palma was both refreshing and revealing. I just hope that governments across Europe take his points on board so that we can get moving again. The travel industry has been severely hit by the coronavirus with airline and travel companies openly critical of their governments. You can see their point; millions of jobs are at stake and the very livelihood of places such as Majorca are in the balance. We need action and we need action now. The travel industry needs to get moving again so that it can offer safe and secure holidays.
