British Airways prepares for travel restart with testing kit plan

London.— British Airways has struck a deal with a COVID-19 testing kit provider as airlines prepare for the desperately-needed restart of summer travel, which is likely to include tests for passengers.

After months of lockdown, airlines hope Britain will give the go-ahead from mid-May for holidays to restart, boosting an industry whose finances have been slammed by the pandemic. But it is not yet clear how mass foreign travel will resume. The government will provide more information on April 12. Travel corridors, which allowed unrestricted movement between Britain and some low-risk countries, could be re-introduced.
