Real Mallorca owner denies wrongdoing

“First and foremost, I reject any insinuation of personal or organizational racism or gender discrimination. I despise language that disrespects any individuals, regardless of race, gender, preference, or choice. Such language has no place in business or at home in what I consider Suns and Mercury families. I am proud of our record of diversity and inclusion on both teams -- whether on the court or in the front office.”

Real Mallorca (First division La Liga Club), Phoenix Suns (NBA) and Phoenix Mercury (NBA) owner Robert Sarver sharply disputed allegations on misdeeds that reportedly will be published in a forthcoming ESPN article. Sarver, a U.S. multi-millionaire bought Mallorca in 2016. According to a Friday tweet from Jordan Schultz, who co-hosts an NBA podcast with Portland Trail Blazers guard CJ McCollum, the ESPN article will accuse Sarver of “racism, sexism and sexual harassment in a series of incidents.” The Suns subsequently posted a statement from Sarver on Twitter: “I am wholly shocked by some of the allegations purported by ESPN about me, personally, or about the Phoenix Suns and Mercury organizations. While I can’t begin to know how to respond to some of the vague suggestions made by mostly anonymous voices, I can certainly tell you that some of the claims I find completely repugnant to my nature and to the character of the Suns/Mercury workplace and I can tell you they never, ever happened.”

crimination. I despise language that disrespects any individuals, regardless of race, gender, preference, or choice. Such language has no place in business or at home in what I consider Suns and Mercury families. I am proud of our record of diversity and inclusion on both teams - whether on the court or in the front office.”

“Didn’t happen”

“I don’t begin to know how to prove that something DIDN’T happen, and it is difficult to erase or forget ugly accusations once they are made,” Sarver said in a statement.

“Even hints of racism or sexism in our culture today are toxic and damaging and should not be lightly raised. I categorically deny any and all suggestions that I used disparaging language related to race or gender. I would like to think that my actions and public record regarding race, gender, or discrimination of any kind, over a lifetime in business and community service, will adequately answer any questions anyone might raise about my commitment to equality and fairness.”

Suns general manager James Jones added in a statement, “None of what’s been said describes the Robert Sarver I know, respect and like -- it just doesn’t.”

Prince says “dangerously narrow window”

London.—Britain’s Prince Charles, in recorded remarks at an environment event in Saudi Arabia yesterday, said there was a “dangerously narrow window» to accelerate climate change action.

Citing experts, he said the U.N Climate Change Conference COP26 due to start at the end of October must have nationally determined contributions (NDCs) with “clear baselines” and net zero emission targets by 2050.

He was addressing the Saudi Green Initiative forum, at which top exporter Saudi Arabia had earlier on Saturday announced its target to reach zero-net emissions by 2060.
